

Some people think that a sense of competition in children should be encouraged. The others believe that children who are taught to co-operate rather than compete become more useful adults.

Using one of our potential abilities takes the chance of others to be well developed. In my opinion, in most situations moderation is preferable as it is with the employment of children abilities; we should encourage children's both competition sense and the ability of co-operating in an equal way to build a better life at the moment and in the future.

Competition, without a doubt, is a very necessary and affective aspect of any one's life which can give us a reason to fight for. What children should learn is to compete in a fair, positive and creative way. Otherwise, it will have a totally reverse result and might end up with variety of emotional, psychiatric and even physical damages such as losing self-confidence, being afraid of defeat, having lots of stress and the like.

Co-operation -as a fundamental feature of human's social life and as a basic reason of human beings survival through the history- on the other hand, makes our life much easier. Therefore, learning how to interact with their peers is the key element for those children who are at their first steps of entering their social life.

To conclude, any of our abilities are created for a reason, though; if we are looking for a brighter future for ourselves and our children we should help them to develop their potential and innate abilities elaborately.

By: Sanaz

Comment: Good Command of Language and smooth elaboration of ideas punctuation and stormy beginning. It could be enhanced by `Branching` the supporting ideas.