

A large proportion of people live and work in other countries today than at any time in the past. It is very probable that in future there will be no borders and people will be able to move freely between countries. Agree or disagree?

Immigration whether as a student immigrant or skilled worker has become dramatically prevalent among people, particularly for those who settle in developing nations in which the dearth of high-level educational facilities alongside the lack of job opportunities creates nasty situations, arousing the residents to decide leaving country with hope to gain the ever more convenient and joyful life. Although there are some who contend that by passing the time, the free moving between the countries is becoming faster and easier than the past, from where I stand, this decision requires advanced consideration, and an adequate patience.

Perhaps the first and foremost reason lies in the fact that though we are living in the globalization era in which accessibility to each other is extremely easy, emigrating to other nations is associated with some cumbersome and stressful procedures, maybe making ones frustrated. Many cosmopolitan countries such as Canada and Australia provide the special situations for foreigners to move there via their occupations or educations; however, a lot of things will affect this process; anything from expenditure of a huge amount of money, sometimes triggering the losing whole investments of some families, to wasting the invaluable time for some months or even years.

On the other side of coin, during the recent years many countries have deployed the severe rule for their immigration process to help hamper the flow of monumental numbers of people who are strongly allured to experiencing utterly different lifestyle in other countries. Conspicuously enough, if these countries do not have any rule or law and accept numerous people from around the world, there will not be a difference between these nations and the origin ones and the living conditions become adverse not only for their residents but also for the immigrants.

To recapitulate, I am of the strong opinion that the developed government will employ the tough regulations to control the growing rate of immigration in imminent future.

By : Haleh