

Some people believe that governments should ban dangerous sports. Others claim that they should have freedom to choose their favorite activities. Discuss both views and present your opinion.

Having excitement – as an impeccable way to escape from the daily grueling routine work- is always under attention of many people in particular those who have adventurous and risky traits. There are various methods to experience excitement among which several sports for instance mountain climbing, bungee jumping and so on, having a critical role for spreading amusement amongst some people. As these kind of sports are associated with hazardous consequences and some troubles for every one, there are some people who contend it is a government responsibility to legislate the strict rule to forbid these activities, none withstanding, from my viewpoint, human is born with liberty, deciding independently for his own life.

Risky sports not only can provide the rejoiced and electrified situation, but also can trigger people to release from themselves as well as the earthly world even just for few minutes. This is an opinion of first group of individuals who stand in majority. These ones claim that any activity even the moderate ones such as walking and running can have a danger for man, hence this is no longer reasonable and logical excuse to be banned by authorities and some ones are deprived from their favored sports. Unless the officials prepare the safety and security for their residents to deal with these sports, the prohibition of doing them is of no meaning.

On the other side of coin, there are some households who repetitively engage with their offspring, tending to experience the hazardous sports and raising many worries among their family members. These families strongly give their emphasis to ban these activities to help reduce the rate of injuries and sometimes death. Based on the idea of this group, if authorities prohibit these dangerous physical activities, their relative fans would have to opt for the other suitable sports which have the less proportion to bring about irreparable implications amongst those.

To sum up, I am of the strong opinion that human must be free to encounter anything which is attractive, exciting and exhilarating in his mind, although having an eye on the safety measures and issues relevant to each activity is more advisable to prevent the detrimental results.

Comment : a very good essay with a bit of an overly elongated intro, though.
